Robert Schumann

1810–1856

Manfred Overture, Op. 115

12 minutes

WHAT TO LISTEN FOR

Three stabbing chords from the full orchestra tear open the curtain. A slow, sorrowing introduction follows, and the tempo gradually quickens until the music breaks into the main fast section.

The principal theme is breathless and driven, always pressing forward and never finding a firm footing. Against it Schumann sets gentler, plaintive phrases. Listen to how the ideas are pulled apart, stretched and joined together again instead of simply being repeated: the whole movement surges up towards passion again and again, and each time falls back.

There is no victory at the end. The fast music exhausts itself, and the slow introduction returns as an epilogue. The overture closes in the minor key, without the redemption a listener might expect.

Jean Sibelius

34 minutes

1865–1957

Violin Concerto in D minor, Op. 47

WHAT TO LISTEN FOR

I. Allegro moderato. There is no orchestral introduction. Over a soft, pulsing cushion of strings the soloist enters at once with a long, wandering melody that seems to come out of the far distance. A second theme arrives dark and low on the violin's G string. Where a development section would normally stand, the orchestra falls silent and the soloist plays a long cadenza built on the opening theme, full of double stops, trills and runs. When the themes return they are darker in colour, and the movement ends with the main theme's dramatic material at full strength.

II. Adagio di molto. A short phrase from clarinets and oboes leads in the violin's broad, heartfelt melody, played over plucked strings. It asks for restraint and simplicity more than brilliance. The orchestra turns stormy in the middle of the movement, and the violin answers with plaintive double stops before the opening melody returns and the music sinks to a serene close.

III. Allegro, ma non tanto. Four bars of drumming rhythm from timpani and low strings set the pace, and the violin leaps in on its lowest string with a dance theme of fierce energy. Tovey called this movement 'a polonaise for polar bears', a joke that has stuck to it ever since. A second theme, with something of the waltz about it, is given first to the orchestra. The solo part grows steadily harder, with passages in thirds, arpeggios, octaves and high harmonics, and the major key is won only in the final bars, where the violin's line climbs upward and the orchestra seals the ending with it.

Antonin Dvorak

1841–1904

Symphony No. 7 in D minor, Op. 70

WHAT TO LISTEN FOR

I. Allegro maestoso. The symphony begins in the dark. Over a low held note in the basses and horns, violas and cellos mutter the main theme, which circles within a narrow range before it suddenly flares up. A gentler second theme, given to flute and clarinet, brings some warmth, but the development is among the stormiest music Dvořák wrote. The ending is unexpected: after a fierce climax the movement dies away into the gloom from which it came, with nothing settled.

II. Poco adagio. A clarinet opens with a melody like a quiet hymn. The calm does not last, and the movement passes through several waves of strong feeling, with fine solos for the horn, before it finds its way back. After the premiere Dvořák cut some forty bars and told Simrock that there was now ‘not a single superfluous note’.

III. Scherzo: Vivace. The nearest the symphony comes to a Czech dance. Violins play a lilting tune while cellos and bassoon sing a different one against it, and the rhythm keeps shifting between two beats and three. The minor key holds the gaiety in check, and the gentle middle section brings only passing relief.

IV. Finale: Allegro. The main theme opens with a leap of an octave, strained and defiant. A broad, singing tune for the cellos offers contrast, and the two ideas are fought out at length. Only in the final bars does the music turn from D minor to a hard-won D major.
